Hello! I really like the policy! One thing is, I think it would be really awesome to help develop artists, too. I really support everything in the plan, and I think it's achievable too. I think a lot of arts practice funding is very focused in universities, and university educated artists represent a fairly small subset of artists who have soecific financial and social privilege. For working class and migrant australians, we work day jobs and do art on the side, which isnt very compelling for grants organisations or galleries to engage with us. I dont pretend to know a perfect way to achieve what I'm talking about, but I think investment and involvement of galleries in community arts organisations to support creative skills for people who seem to be ignored by the wider arts community would be amazing and culturally rich
